

Statement Industrial Farming

Erik Wohlleben

The first thing I don't like about industrial farming is that chemicals are sprayed on the plants, not all of them, but it's part of it. And the animals still shouldn't be kept in masses. Today you can't say that farming is manual work, the only manual work you do is driving the tractor around and adjusting the electronic devices and measuring instruments. Much manual work does not belong there any more. For example when milking a cow, in former times you sat at the cow and milked the cow yourself, today you put a suction device at the cow and you have your milk, without much work.
