

B5 - Small or large?

I completely agree with the statements from the blog, the biggest point in this article that I find frightening is the money. The farmers get very little money for the work and the money they have to put into it. But that's the way people are designed, they always want to buy the cheapest. I'm no different in this point, you save on things you shouldn't save on. I think the problem you are addressing is very justified and the intention to save world hunger. But I think the general framework is really good, only the implementation is missing, the work should be much more appreciated in today's world, which it unfortunately is not.